

Edgar H.

The legacy of heroes are usually honored, and their names will inspire many future generations after them. I do not find myself idolizing a specific hero, I feel that there is a certain type of heroes in this world that deserve more attention. They are the militant supporters of the working class. They seek to break the chains of those who are oppressed but yet are the main workforce of society. They seek to combat evils that are so deeply rooted in our current society that we are completely blinded by its atrocities. The precise reason of me admiring them is because their acts of heroism were stifled, but they fought on with persistence. They refused to give up even when their names and legacy are twisted by the malicious historical revisionism of their opponents: the ruling class. I am proud to say I am not fooled by it; I admire those who fought for the liberation of the working class.

Is it even remotely fair, or logical, for some in this world contributing little to society to possess an unimaginably immense wealth? Should the masses of the working class be exploited by the few who do nothing but enjoy their fruits of labor? Taking a real, hard look at the current society, anyone possessing the right attitude can see that the system our current society is operating under is one to be abolished, or superseded. The militant heroes of the working class realize that, and are willing to fight for a better world for the collective mankind. They recognize that the power of production, which is the core of society, should lie in the hands of those directly operating and contributing to it, not those who seek to garner wealth through the labor of others for their own self-interest.

They reject the passive actions encouraged by the ruling class do not work; the reason why the ruling class encourage passive actions is because they know that they cannot go far. Examples of those militant heroes include those who fought in the worker's movement during the Industrial Revolution in America. They were fighting for a better life for workers exploited, and through blood and sweat they managed to at least achieve a portion of their goal. Those are the forgotten heroes of the May Day. The reason why labor day is different in the United States than rest of the world is because it was originally a day of break for workers made by the ruling class to temporarily relieve class tensions, and only to crush their movement subsequently.

Up to this day, labor day still lies on September 5th instead of May 1st, a mark of humiliation for the working class. Yet there are still fighters and heroes of the working class to this day, continuing their everyday struggle in hope of a brighter future. I respect all of those who participated in the struggle, and I will support and call solidarity with them with no sign of hesitation.